'A remarkable and unusual collection, and not just because of the sheer geographical and chronological range of the themes which the authors discuss, but also because of the fact that this large body of scholarship arises from a single Department of History.... I doff my hat to its editor and organizers. It is also most successful in reminding readers of just how early were the "interactions between the Universal and the Local," and not just at the economic level but in the world of ideas, culture, language, and material artefacts.' – Paul Kennedy, Yale University

'These essays are unusual in two respects: the diversity of their subject matter and the cohesion of their approach, seeking always to understand what happened in terms of universal ideas and ideals, coming from afar, interacting with local heritages to produce something new, distinctive and intelligible.... Seldom does a collection of historical essays by specialists in such diverse fields achieve so much.' – from the Afterword by William H. McNeill, University of Chicago Globalization envelops our world and has long historical roots. This edited volume shows how the universal principles embodied in the process have interacted with diverse localities across the globe during the past two centuries.

A. G. Hopkins presents a collection of fresh case studies that draw on different parts of the world – ranging from the Navajo Reservation to Japan, via the Middle East and Vietnam – and cover various types of history: economic, political, social, cultural and intellectual. Hopkins's Introduction places the new global history in the context of national history and world history; William H. McNeill, the pioneering historian of large-scale history, concludes the volume with a reflective Afterword.
The historical record demonstrates that globalization has not only produced uniformity but has also reinforced difference. Global History offers a coherent explanation of these diverging outcomes, and in doing so points towards a new type of world history. It is essential reading for anyone studying international history, world history, transnational history, globalization, or world politics.
